Plans for wind farm put on hold

Plans for a wind farm in the town of Liberal, Saskatchewan, have been put on hold. The town council has decided to delay the project until next year. The council members said they need more time to study the project and its impact on the town. The wind farm would consist of 10 turbines, each with a capacity of 2.5 megawatts. The project would generate 25 million kilowatt-hours of electricity per year. The town council will meet again on July 24 to discuss the project further.
