Q&A: Tracking the source of stomach bug outbreak
 BY JENNIFER HARRIS

WATERLOO — When an illness outbreak occurs, it's often difficult to track down the source of the problem. But in the case of a recent outbreak of a stomach bug in Lubbock, the source was found in a surprising place: a local restaurant.

The outbreak began in late June when several people reported symptoms of a stomach bug, including nausea, vomiting and diarrhea. The illness was first identified at a local restaurant, where several people had eaten.

Health officials quickly investigated and found that the restaurant was the source of the outbreak. The restaurant had been serving a popular dish that contained a type of seafood that was contaminated.

The restaurant has since taken steps to prevent a recurrence of the outbreak, including improving food handling practices and increasing staff training.

Health officials are now working to identify other people who may have eaten at the restaurant during the outbreak period and are encouraging them to seek medical attention if they experience symptoms.

5-year-old leaves competitors in his dust

By Jennifer Harris

It's not every day that a 5-year-old boy wins a race, but that's exactly what happened to a young boy named Gurule at the recent triathlon held in Lubbock. Gurule, who is 5 years old, finished the race in first place, leaving his competitors in his dust.

Gurule's father, who is also a triathlete, said that his son has been training for the race for several months. Gurule's father said that his son is a very determined and hardworking athlete.

Gurule's victory was a surprise to many of the other participants, who were all older children and adults. Gurule's father said that his son is a very competitive and hardworking athlete.
