Fifty years ago, the world's most famous African American leader died. His dream of a better life for all people of color in America has inspired generations of Americans to fight for equality. In San Antonio, the dream lives on in the form of a massive stone statue of Martin Luther King Jr. in the heart of the city. Local residents gathered for a ceremony to dedicate the statue on August 28, 2013, marking the 50th anniversary of King's death. The statue, which stands 18 feet tall, is a tribute to King's legacy and his vision of a more just and equitable society. The ceremony was held at the site of the statue, which is located in the heart of the city. The statue is a symbol of hope and a reminder of the struggle for equality that continues to this day. The ceremony was attended by thousands of people, including local residents, politicians, and members of the community. The statue is a testament to King's enduring legacy and his vision of a better future for all people.

San Antonio proposal could bar Christians from city council

A proposal to amend the city charter in San Antonio could potentially bar Christians from serving on the city council. The proposal, which was introduced by a city council member, would require council members to be members of a "recognized religious denomination." This could be interpreted to mean that only members of established, mainstream religions would be eligible for election to the council. The proposal has sparked controversy, with some arguing that it would discriminate against Christians and other religious groups. The city council is currently debating the proposal, and a final decision is expected in the near future.
