Feds consider permit to drill on Kansas wetlands

By MICHAEL COLEMAN

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is considering a permit to drill for oil on the Wetlands of the North American Wetlands Conservation Program in Kansas. The permit would allow the drilling of a well on the Wetlands, which are located in the northwestern part of the state. The permit would be issued by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, which is responsible for the management of the Wetlands.

The Wetlands are a critical habitat for many species of birds and other wildlife. The drilling of a well on the Wetlands could have a significant impact on the Wetlands and the species that live there. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service is currently in the process of reviewing the permit application. For more information, visit www.fws.gov.

By MICHAEL COLEMAN

Kansas agencies are warning of a threat to hunting dogs from a type of algae that is growing in the state. The algae, which is called Microcystis, is a toxin-producing cyanobacterium. It is found in many of the water bodies in Kansas, including the Kansas River and the Neosho River. The algae can be harmful to dogs if they drink the water or eat the algae. The Kansas Department of Wildlife, Parks and Tourism is currently in the process of testing the water for the presence of the algae. For more information, visit www.kdwr.com.
