Mental health care suffers drought season
Cuts cause 'unnecessary suffering, raises risk of crisis'
By Heidi Cohen
As the nation grapples with a recession that has no end in sight, the mental health care system is suffering from a drought season. Funding cuts have led to a loss of staff, reduced services and increased wait times for care. The result is a crisis of care for many people who need it most. Heidi Cohen reports on the impact of these cuts on the mental health care system.
