Mental health care suffers drought season
Cuts cause 'unnecessary suffering, raises risk of crisis'
By HOPE COHEN
As the nation grapples with a recession that has led to a loss of jobs and income, many people are struggling with mental health issues. The American Psychiatric Association reports that the number of people with mental health problems has increased significantly in the past few years. This is due to a variety of factors, including the loss of loved ones, financial stress, and the overall state of the economy. Mental health care is essential for many people, but it is often underfunded and understaffed. This can lead to a lack of access to care, which can have serious consequences for individuals and society as a whole.
