Mental health care suffers drought season
Cuts cause 'unnecessary suffering, raises risk of crisis'
By Heidi Cohen
As the drought continues, so does the mental health care crisis. The Village Press and Herald reports that cuts in mental health services are causing unnecessary suffering and raising the risk of crisis for many in the community. The article highlights the impact of budget cuts on mental health care, particularly in the area of crisis intervention services. It notes that the lack of these services can lead to more severe mental health issues and hospitalizations, which are far more costly for the system. The article also mentions that the drought has led to increased stress and anxiety, further exacerbating mental health problems.
