Mental health care suffers drought season
Cuts cause 'unnecessary suffering, raises risk of crisis'
By Heidi Cohen
The state's mental health care system is in a state of crisis, with cuts to funding and staff leading to a "drought season" of care, according to a report from the California Mental Health Services Authority. The report, released last week, says that the state's mental health care system is "in a state of crisis" and that cuts to funding and staff are leading to "unnecessary suffering" and a "drought season" of care. The report also says that the state's mental health care system is "in a state of crisis" and that cuts to funding and staff are leading to "unnecessary suffering" and a "drought season" of care.
