Who needs Bluetooth headsets? Motorola patents 'neck tattoo' smartphone accessory
A Motorola patent application filed last week describes a "neck tattoo" accessory for smartphones. The device is a small, flexible strip that can be attached to the back of a smartphone. It contains a microphone and a speaker, and is designed to be used as a hands-free communication device. The patent also describes a method for using the device, which involves attaching it to the back of the phone and then using it to make calls or listen to music.

Company behind Obamacare site has checked past
The company behind the Obamacare website has a history of legal trouble. The company, HealthCare.gov, was founded in 2009 and has since become the central hub for the Affordable Care Act. However, it has been plagued by numerous lawsuits and legal challenges, including a major lawsuit filed by the state of Texas in 2011. The lawsuit alleged that the company had engaged in a series of deceptive practices to keep the website from working properly. The case was eventually dismissed, but it has since been re-opened. The company's legal history has raised questions about its ability to manage the complex and high-stakes task of running the Obamacare website.

DC official fired after criticizing Obama change
A senior official at the Department of Justice was fired for criticizing a change made by President Obama. The official, who had been in the position for several years, was accused of making derogatory comments about the President's actions. The firing was seen as a warning to other officials not to criticize the President's policies.
