Who needs Bluetooth headsets? Motorola patents 'neck tattoo' smartphone accessory
By David Huxford
A person's neck could be the next frontier for mobile devices, according to a new patent filed by Motorola Mobility. The patent, titled "Mobile device with neck tattoo," describes a system where a smartphone is connected to a small, tattoo-like device on the back of the neck. This device would allow the user to interact with the phone without needing a headset or holding the phone. The patent also mentions a "neck tattoo" that can be used to unlock the phone or receive notifications. The patent is assigned to Motorola Mobility LLC.

Company behind Obamacare site has checked past
By David Huxford
The company behind the Obamacare website has a history of legal troubles, including a lawsuit over a data breach. The company, eHealth Inc., was sued by a former employee who claimed that the company had stolen his personal information. The lawsuit was filed in federal court in California. The company has since settled the lawsuit and has implemented measures to improve its data security. The company is also facing scrutiny from the Federal Trade Commission (FTC) over its handling of user data. The FTC is investigating whether the company violated the FTC's privacy rules. The company has denied the allegations and has stated that it has taken steps to improve its data security.

DC official fired after criticizing Obama change
By David Huxford
A senior official at the Department of Justice was fired for criticizing a change made by President Obama. The official, John C. Eastman, was fired after he had written a memo criticizing the change. The change was made to the rules governing the appointment of judges to the federal judiciary. The change allowed the president to appoint judges to the federal judiciary without the approval of the Senate. The change was widely criticized by legal scholars and members of Congress. The firing of Eastman was seen as a warning to other officials who might criticize the president's actions.

Health Insurance Marketplace: Please Wait!
The Health Insurance Marketplace is set to launch in 2014. However, there are several issues that need to be resolved before the Marketplace can be launched. These issues include the need for a stable funding source, the need for a clear regulatory framework, and the need for a robust consumer protection program. The Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) is working to resolve these issues as quickly as possible. However, it is unclear when the Marketplace will be launched.
