Company behind Obamacare site has checkedered past
By David Huxford
The company behind the website for the Affordable Care Act (ACA), known as HealthCare.gov, has a history of controversy. The company, known as eHealthCare.gov, was founded in 2009 and was responsible for the development and launch of the ACA website. The company has been criticized for its handling of the website's launch, which was plagued by technical problems and long wait times. The company has also been criticized for its handling of the website's security, which has been breached several times. The company's history of controversy has led to questions about its ability to manage the ACA website.

DC official fired after criticizing Obama change
By David Huxford
A senior official at the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) has been fired after criticizing a change to the Affordable Care Act (ACA). The official, known as [Name], was fired for making public statements that were critical of the change. The change in question is a modification to the ACA's individual mandate, which requires most Americans to have health insurance. The change would allow individuals to purchase health insurance through the ACA marketplace without being subject to the individual mandate. The firing of the official has raised questions about the HHS's handling of the ACA and the role of senior officials in the department.
