Gun fight: Smith & Wesson, Ruger quit California over stamping requirement

WICHITA, Kan. — Smith & Wesson and Ruger have quit California over a new stamping requirement for handguns. The companies say the requirement is too costly and will hurt the state's economy.

The requirement is a new law that requires handgun manufacturers to stamp their guns with the name of the manufacturer and the date of manufacture. The law also requires the manufacturer to stamp the gun with the name of the state in which it was manufactured.

Smith & Wesson and Ruger say that the requirement is too costly and will hurt the state's economy. They say that the requirement will increase the cost of handguns, which will make them less affordable for law-abiding citizens.

The companies say that they have decided to quit California because they cannot afford to comply with the requirement. They say that they have already spent a significant amount of money on the requirement, and they do not see a way to recoup their costs.
