National Beef to shut California plant, cites tight cattle supply

Additional processing could be seen locally

National Beef
The closure of a 100,000-head-per-year plant in California has caused a ripple effect in the beef industry, with some processors in Kansas and Oklahoma looking for ways to handle the extra supply. National Beef, based in Denver, announced the closure of its plant in California on Jan. 28. The plant had been producing about 100,000 head of beef annually. The closure is expected to result in a significant increase in the supply of beef in the region, which could lead to lower prices for consumers. However, some processors in Kansas and Oklahoma are looking for ways to handle the extra supply, which could lead to increased competition and lower prices for those processors as well.

Obama running out of reasons to reject Keystone XL

Canada
The Obama administration is running out of reasons to reject the Keystone XL pipeline, with the White House now focusing on the pipeline's impact on the environment. The administration has previously cited concerns about the pipeline's safety and the potential for leaks, but these arguments are being challenged by the courts and the public. The White House is now focusing on the pipeline's impact on the environment, particularly on the potential for increased greenhouse gas emissions. The administration is also facing pressure from the courts to approve the pipeline, as the courts have repeatedly ruled in favor of the pipeline's construction. The White House is now looking for ways to delay the pipeline's construction, but it is running out of reasons to do so.
