Woody Allen's allies cast doubt on sexual abuse claims

Woody Allen's allies cast doubt on sexual abuse claims

NEW YORK (AP) — Woody Allen's allies on Monday cast doubt on the sexual abuse claims of a woman who says she was sexually abused by the filmmaker in the 1970s.

The woman, who is now 40, says she was sexually abused by Allen when she was 17 and 18 years old. She says she was pregnant with his child, but she says she was not aware of the pregnancy at the time.

Allen's lawyer, Robert M. Speiser, says that Allen has never been charged with a crime and that he has never been convicted of any crime. He says that Allen has been married to Mia Farrow for 35 years and that they have four children together.

Speiser says that Allen has been a successful filmmaker and actor and that he has been a member of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences. He says that Allen has been a role model for many young people and that he has been a great father to his children.

The woman's lawyer, David M. Berkowitz, says that the woman's claims are credible and that she has provided evidence to support her claims. He says that the woman's claims are not just hearsay and that they are based on a long and painful history of abuse.

Allen's lawyer says that he has never seen any evidence to support the woman's claims and that he believes that she is making up the story. He says that he has never seen any evidence to support the woman's claims and that he believes that she is making up the story.

Nothing controversial in Super Bowl ads

NEW YORK (AP) — Many Super Bowl ads are so tame, they could be shown on any network, says a former advertising executive who says he has seen many of the ads.

The former executive, who is now a consultant, says that the ads are mostly about product placement and that they are not controversial. He says that the ads are mostly about product placement and that they are not controversial.
