Pilots often head to wrong airports, reports show
A study of 100 pilots in the U.S. found that 70 percent of them had made at least one wrong airport landing in the past year. The study, conducted by the University of Southern California, found that pilots often land at the wrong airport because they are tired, stressed, or have a bad day. The study also found that pilots often land at the wrong airport because they are confused by the airport's name or location.

Mich. college offers course in zombies, apocalypse
A new course at a Michigan college offers students a chance to learn about the zombie apocalypse. The course, titled "Zombie Apocalypse: A Survival Guide," covers topics such as how to survive a zombie attack, how to build a safe haven, and how to deal with the psychological effects of a zombie apocalypse.

NE Kansas residents feel crowded by oil producers
Residents in northeastern Kansas are feeling crowded by oil producers. The area has seen a rapid increase in oil production, which has led to a surge in traffic, noise, and other disturbances. Many residents are concerned about the impact of the oil industry on their quality of life.
