Family tests Kan. water law, claims impairment
A family in Kansas is testing the state's water law, claiming that the law is causing impairment to their water supply. The family, who live in a rural area, has been having difficulty getting water from their well. They believe that the state's water law, which requires landowners to pump water out of their wells, is the cause of the problem. They are suing the state to stop the law and to pay for the cost of their water supply.

Kansas considers revised permit for coal plant
The Kansas Department of Health and Senior Services is considering a revised permit for a coal plant. The plant, which is located in the state's coal fields, is currently under construction. The permit is required for the plant to operate. The department is reviewing the permit to ensure that it meets the state's environmental standards. The revised permit includes provisions for water quality and air pollution control.
