Family tests Kan. water law, claims impairment
A family in Kansas is testing a new water law that allows landowners to sue for impairment of their water rights. The family claims that a nearby coal plant is polluting the water and affecting their health and property. They are seeking compensation for the damage. The case is expected to set a precedent for future water law cases in the state.

Kansas considers revised permit for coal plant
The Kansas Department of Health and Senior Services is considering a revised permit for a coal plant. The permit would allow the plant to emit more pollutants than previously allowed. The department is reviewing the permit to ensure it meets state and federal air quality standards. The coal plant is a major source of air pollution in the region and has been the subject of several lawsuits.
