Lawmakers worry about teacher fingerprinting

Lawmakers in Oklahoma are expressing concern over a proposed law that would require teachers to be fingerprinted. The law, which is part of a larger education reform package, would require all teachers to be fingerprinted and have their fingerprints scanned at a central location. The law is expected to take effect in the fall of 2014. The lawmakers are worried that the law could be used to target teachers and that it could be a violation of their privacy. They are also worried that the law could be used to justify the firing of teachers.
