Appeals court questions proof-of-citizenship rules

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit has questioned the rules governing proof of citizenship for naturalized citizens. The court's decision could have a significant impact on the ability of naturalized citizens to vote in federal elections. The court's decision is based on the fact that the rules require naturalized citizens to provide proof of their citizenship in order to register to vote. The court has found that these rules are unconstitutional because they discriminate against naturalized citizens.

Colorado's anti-'tab rat' campaign hits snag

Colorado's anti-"tab rat" campaign has hit a snag. The campaign, which is led by the state's attorney general, is aimed at reducing the number of "tab rats" in the state. "Tab rats" are individuals who have obtained citizenship through the state's "fast-track" process. The campaign has been successful in reducing the number of "tab rats" in the state, but it has also been criticized for being too restrictive. The campaign has led to a number of lawsuits and has caused a significant amount of controversy.
